

Diana Ingram

Diana Ingram is a senior business development, sales, and marketing leader with an extensive background in information technology in the U.S., Latin American and other global markets. She has led organizations with as many as 8,000 employees with revenues exceeding $2 billion. As a leader of Oracle's technology consulting services business in Southern California, she is focused on helping corporate clients accelerate their transition to cloud computing and enhance their IT security posture. Earlier, she was executive vice president and head of operations for the U.S. start-up of networking software company, IBT /Realtime. In previous years, Ms. Ingram held several key positions at IBM including director of security and privacy services U.S.; vice president of global sales, wireless e-business solutions; vice president of telecommunications/media sector, Latin America. In addition, she was senior vice president and general manager of operations, west region, Kinko's Inc., now part of FedEx.

Ms. Ingram serves on the boards of EMC Group, Rexford Industrial Realty and the UCLA Foundation. She is a past president of the Southern California affiliate of the International Women's Forum and continues to serve on its board of directors. Her previous board service includes Big Brothers Big Sisters, Los Angeles, the Los Angeles Urban League and the Coalition for Clean Air.

She received her bachelor of arts degree from Stanford University and her master of business administration from the Kellogg Graduate School of Management at Northwestern University.